What keeps you working in Early Intervention?

Here are some quotes from our EI in WI Ambassadors:

I love being able to give parents the gift of empowerment... the idea that they are their child's best teacher, that they are "good enough" and there is nobody better than them for their child. To be able to give them this gift at the beginning of their parenting journey can have ripple effects for a lifetime.

Being supported with an amazing team and boss that understands how important it is for us to take care of our families just as much as it is to take care of the families that we work with too.

My team, the flexibility of the work and all of the changes and growth I see in families from birth until they turn 3 :)

There's always something going on which keeps me plenty busy. I love sharing in the excitement with the family and the primary about the progress the kids are making. My team is incredible- supportive, non judgmental. We share the ups and downs together.

When working with a family you often build a strong and trusting relationship, as you become a team with them, it's the nature of the job. So then watching that parent's understanding of their child's development increase, along with their confidence and ability to facilitate growth with their own child, is just priceless.

My AMAZING co-workers and supervisor. Also, the delight in parents faces when a child does something new that we've been working on.

What keeps you working in Early Intervention?

I have been fortunate enough to have an amazing team. It's an honor to be working with a family and their little one/ones and I never lose sight of the gift it is to be a part of their journey helping however we can.

I get the most "employment nourishment" from my families who seem to have the odds most stacked against them. Low socioeconomic status, lower education levels, less resources available to them. These are the families that seem to celebrate the small successes in big ways. They sometimes work the hardest and longest before seeing the small victories, so it is so rewarding to help them and walk with them in their journey of parenthood, child development, personal development, and life in general.

The impact that we have on a parent-child relationship lasts much longer than their time in Birth to 3. That alone is incredibly rewarding.

Helping families build stronger connections with their kiddos; and as a result, they experience an increase in positive day-to-day interactions that are a solid foundation for the next years.
